The Fund returned 0.2% in September - a month that saw mixed returns across markets with strong returns from technology shares, offset by negative returns from fixed income markets and non-technology shares. These markets were negatively impacted by rising interest rates and oil prices. The United States central bank increased interest rates during September as it looked to control inflation. Returns for the United States, Australian and New Zealand market indices were -0.3%, -2.4% and -0.4% respectively in September. Fund returns benefited from the fall in value of the New Zealand dollar, which fell 4.8% versus the US dollar.

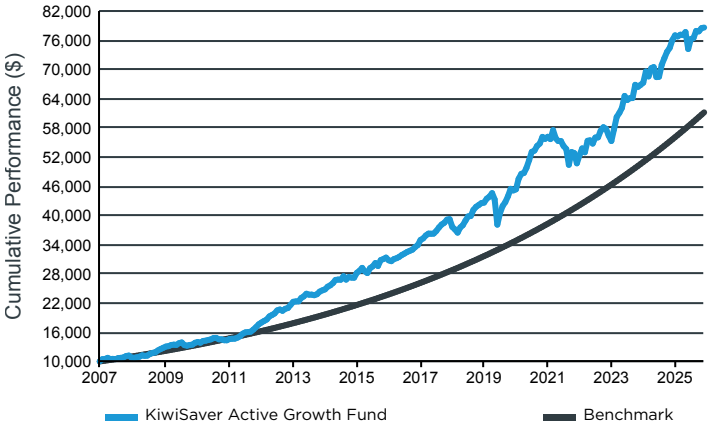

Key positive company performers during the month were social media company Meta (+26.8%) and computer chip companies Micron (+11.1%), AMD (+30.0%) and TSMC (+10.1%). Meta rose following the US launch of its new personal AI agent - Meta Muse, to strong reviews and downloads. Personal agents are the next step for AI and can do things on behalf of users such as respond to emails, book appointments and negotiate with customer service for refunds. Computer chip companies rose as agents require more compute and memory, which remain in short supply and continue to see prices rise. The financial sector was weak during September as investors feared agents may make it easier for consumers to negotiate better deals, which may pressure margins.

The outlook for share markets is supported by good growth in the US and the significant investment in Artificial Intelligence (AI), which is benefiting many sectors including technology and industrial companies. Negatives for markets include mixed growth outside of the US and sustained high oil prices, which could lead to higher inflation, higher interest rates and lower economic growth. While AI is creating investment opportunities it is also creating risks for share markets which continue to debate the winners and losers from the AI investment cycle. Price falls have led to higher yields on fixed income and income-producing shares to historically attractive levels. Reflecting the uncertain environment, the Fund's strategy remains active and to concentrate investment into companies and markets where we are best rewarded for risk over the medium term.
