The Fund returned 0.4% in October, taking its one-year return to 1.0%. The month saw significant volatility within share markets, although overall index-level performance was muted, while bonds meaningfully outperformed shares. The Fund's performance result for the month illustrates the benefits of diversification in dampening volatility from riskier asset classes.

Technology stocks fell sharply in October, reversing September's gains. This was driven by concerns over the financing and sustainability of the AI build-out, along with earnings reports that failed to meet lofty investor expectations. While the medium-term AI theme is likely to endure, the Fund's exposure to US and technology shares detracted from performance. Conversely, non-tech shares sharply outperformed, and the Fund's Australian, UK and more income-orientated shares performed well, offsetting some of the weakness in technology.

After multiple months of underperformance, bonds rebounded sharply as investors repriced growth expectations lower. The RBNZ's surprise decision to hold interest rates also supported our NZ bonds, where the Fund has been heavily tilted, while remaining underweight global bonds.

Looking ahead, there are reasons for optimism around share market returns. Earnings growth remains strong, economic growth is robust and the AI build-out continues to drive activity. However, the rising capital needs of that build-out are weighing on asset prices. There is also a risk that global economic growth slows even as inflation remains elevated.

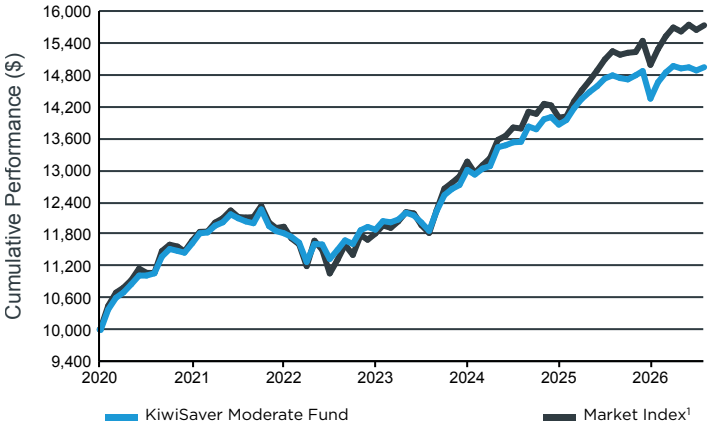

This calls for a flexible approach: maintaining diversification and rebalancing to capture rotations across markets and asset classes. Given these near-term risks, the Fund reduced its exposure to both bonds and shares in favour of cash at month end, but we are looking for opportunities to add to both.
